

Leadership Training Camp 2025

By Mr Cyrus CHAU

The captioned Camp was organised by the YMC at Lei Yue Mun Park on 18 January 2025. The dynamic and engaging day camp attracted around 50 participants, including engineering students and young engineers, who enjoyed a unique opportunity to enhance their leadership, communication, and teamwork skills, all of which are essential for professional success in today's competitive landscape.

Recognising the importance of soft skills in complementing technical expertise, the Camp aimed to create an environment where participants could learn, collaborate, and grow together. It featured a variety of interactive and engineering-related group activities designed to enhance teamwork and leadership skills. Among these activities, two group challenges stood out, particularly the Egg Drop Challenge and the mini trebuchet, which required participants to apply their engineering skills and work collaboratively to achieve a common goal.

The Egg Drop Challenge was a highlight of the Camp. Participants were divided into teams and tasked with designing a protective structure for an egg. The objective was to prevent the egg from breaking after being dropped from height. This challenge not only required creativity and a sound understanding of engineering principles, but also emphasised the importance of teamwork and collaboration. The teams had to brainstorm ideas, allocate roles, and work together to construct their designs within a limited timeframe.

The Camp was a resounding success and achieved its objectives of enhancing leadership, communication, and teamwork skills among engineering students and young engineers. It also provided a unique and engaging environment for participants to develop essential soft skills to complement their technical expertise.

By focusing on experiential learning and community building, the Camp not only equipped attendees with valuable skills, but also fostered lasting connections among future leaders in the engineering field. It is believed that the insights and experiences gained from this camp will undoubtedly contribute to the professional growth and success of all the participants.
